CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR.

THURSDAY APRIL 19, 1923

The jury went home last Saturday after two weeks strenuous work in the nisi prius court. William Dudley who had received a life sentence from the jury the Saturday before when the sun was shining and spring was in the air, was brought into court just a week after to be asked if he had anything to say why the sentence of the court should not be pronounced. The day was dark, cold, gloomy and rainy, and the prisoner had changed as much as the weather. He had received the blow without flinching but now there was despair in his face. He answered that he had nothing to say except that he was not guilty, and his voice was earnest and broken. Talk about law being a good drama. It is the real thing, the substance and not the shadow. Life itself and not interpretation. Some invisible power had wiped hope from the prisoner's countenance during the week. The judge was considerate and his manner was kind and he forbore to torture the prisoner with unnecessary words. Saying that the jury had determined his fate and left nothing for the court to do except to pronounce the sentence told him that the judgment was that he be confined in the penitentiary of this State for the rest of his natural life and that he would be conveyed there to be dealt with according to the usages and the customs of that institution, and remanded him to jail. I was reminded of a melancholy passage that I once read that goes sometning like this: The sombre Celt who is likely to be destroyed with the horror that is on him, and the black darkness with the noise in it the like of what the sea would be making and it stirring the bones of a corpse and the rain falling.

Then came again Bedford Curry being led to the bar by the sheriff to be further dealt with according to law. This young prisoner was the only absentee present. Last court he sat and heard himself accused before a jury of running a ford car while intoxicated and killing a cow and tearing down four panels of fence in one fell swoop. And before the jury had completed its verdict he went on his way choosing rather the ridges than the roads. He surrendered this court to save his brother from having to pay a bail bond. The court gave him the task of paying a fine and sixty days in jail and released the bondsman. The prisoner asked: "Can I have credit for the eight days I have been in jail?" And when the court said he could, he went out of the court-room joyful. So much for hope.

Nothing was said as to William Dudley having credit for the time he had been in jail. It was unimportant.

The case of Henry against the C. & O. Railway Company was called. A suit for collision betwen a passenger train and motor truck at a grade crossing at Bartow. One of the jury men on the voir dire said he could not sit on the case because he was a stockholder of the defendant company. I understood the attorney for the railroad company to say that this was the first time he had met one of his stockholders so far as he knew. It was a remarkable accident. Two men in the truck were thrown out on the ground, and the truck itself was hurled ninety feet. One of the men was uninjured. He said he thought the truck had broken down. The other was somewhat bruised and sore but was able to go on his way. The truck was demolished. The plaintiff based his right to recover on the allegation that the train had not whistled nor rung a bell for the crossing. The defense was that the driver of the truck had not stopped, looked nor listened as he approached the crossing. The jury seemed to take the view that the train being the larger that if the drivers of the truck had not noticed so large an object as a train, that the trainmen were not any more to blame for not observing so small an object in comparison as a truck, and the verdict was for the railroad company.

Lesson to be inculcated: That in approaching a crossing in a motor car some one, no matter whether it be the driver or a passenger, should cry out in a loud voice, "Railroad!"

This term of court finally disposed of the homicide case of the State of West Virginia against Captain W. T. Poague for shooting and killing Asa Ryder, an escaped convict from the state road camp, for whom a reward had been offered. It was a case in which public sentiment was sharply divided, and it involved questions of human rights that could not be determined in any way as well as by a public trial before a jury. The case was tried at great length last October and resulted in a hung jury. It was again thrashed out in the present court and the verdict was not guilty.

Captain Poague is a prominent citizen of this county, and while not nearly related to the Poages of Pocahontas, they have a common ancestry, some prominent men of that name being the earliest settlers of Augusta county. He is a V. M. I. man, a son of Prof. Poague, of that institution Capt. Poague first came to this county as a civil engineer on railroad work He married Miss Moore of Stony Bottom. He served in the world war with the rank of captain He returned here and opened a store at Beard, where he is postmaster.

Asa Ryder, the deceased, was a native of this county and was widely connected with some of the oldest families of this section. He was a grandson of the late R. E L. Doyle. At the time of his conviction he was in his twenties, a tall gangling youth with a vacant look about his face. He was convicted of taking a car while the owner was at church and making a poor getaway. He left the prison road camp with Jim Astin and a man by the name of Hatfield. Hatfield was from some other county, and went his way, but Asa and Jim came back to Pocahontas county. It must have been a homing instinct for certainly any other place would have been better for them than here where they could be identified.

Alex Stewart has a store just beyond Droop Mountain in Greenbrier On Monday he found his store had been broken open and robbed and that goods which he afterwards valued at $112 00 had been taken. He got busy. It occurred to him that his store being on the railway that the burglars might be following the line, and he phoned to the store of Moore & Poague at Beard, ten or twelve miles up the river, on the railroad. and across the line in Pocahontas.

Stewart did not know what all was gone, but he did know that his accumulation of ginseng worth much fine gold had been taken and that the lot contained one large root with a protuberance on it that could be easily identified. The phone bell rang in the store at Beard, and was answered by Poague and then ensued one of those one sided conversations which are so maddening to the curious who are looking on. It is not certain how much if any Ryder who was in the store-room heard or understood as to this conversation. It was arranged that Stewart would come on the next train which was even then whistling, and in a half hour or so Stewart got off the train and came across to the store. Stewart carried a gun. Ryder spoke to him, saying, "Hello buddy, you are going to get a mess of squirrels?" That remark by the boy convict to a man fifty-five years old, of a serious and thoughtful demeanor, will give you some idea of the deficiency in the mental make up of the deceased that impressed the casual observer. He did not know Stewart Evidently the sight of the gun excited him After that events happened with great swiftness. Stewart identified the sang shown him by Poague, and this was the sang that Ryder had brought there to sell. It is pretty certain that if Ryder had attempted to leave before Stewart came that Poague would have tried to detain him by force. But Ryder was kept there by the promise to pay for the sang by money that was expected on the mail that came by the train that Stewart was coming on.

When Ryder saw that Stewart came to inspect the sang, he attempted to escape. He ran towards the river. It became a hue and cry case at ouce. There were people about the store and the depot. He ran out of the store by the depot and into the Greenbrier River, perhaps a hundred yards. The Greenbrier was at that stage of flood that the old rivermen know as a rafting tide, which is a flood too deep for safe fording, and deep enough for a raft of some fifty thousand feet of lumber. The pursuers believed that his capture was inevitable because of the flood in the river, but it was soon apparent that Ryder was going across the river, and if he got across that he would soon be in the woods that stetched unbroken for more than a hundred miles towards the North Carolina line. This had its effect on the pursuers. The first shot was fired by Stewart in the pursuit, before he got in the water. Could have easily shot him between the store and the fringe of trees on the bank, says Stewart, but that he fired into the air, and taking it for granted that the fugitive would have to come out on the same side of the river that he went in on, Stewart made for an opening in the brush farther down the stream, and he fired no more.

The rest of the pursuers went to the river bank, and halted there and called on the man to surrender. Mike Callison, a man of mature years and of excellent appearance was there. His hail to the boy ought to have been heeded by him: "In the name of mercy, man, stop, no one is trying to hurt you." But Ryder kept going.

He was about half way across, and in water waist deep when Poague began to fire on him, with a small bore rifle. The first shot hit the water about ten feet from the deceased. The second shot hit him in the hand And the next shot was through the body. The boy fell back on the water floated for a moment and sank. The third shot was fatal As near as I could gather, the first shot from the rifle was fired at an angle across the river at a distance of about 150 yards, and that the last shot perhaps 175 or 200 yards. It is well established too that the boy had many chances to give himself up, and that if he had not been shot he would have made his escape. So far as I could find out there was no one on the east side of the river to intercept him, while the west bank was lined with persons In Ryder's pockets were found numerous articles that had been burglarized from Stewart's store, so there can be no doubt that at the time he was shot that he was guilty of a felony and was trying to escape And at the same time, there were picture cards in the mail offering a reward of fifty dollars for him as an escaped convict, a fact that was known to none of the persons present at the killing. But the identity was established at the inquest.

It is almost always the case where a fleeing criminal is killed by a zealous officer, that public sentiment divides, and that was immediately apparent in this case, and in a proper way a demand arose for the prosecution of the man who fired the fatal shots. The controversy is as old as the law itself. It was generally admitted that Poague had the power of an officer in the respect, but his opponents said that he had no more power, than an officer, and that the fleeing man ought not to have been killed. It was pointed out that the State of West Virginia had offered a reward at the time for the arrest as an escaped convict. The opponent would say, "Yes, but Poague did not know it." And this made a complicated question of right and wrong that has never been settled satisfactory to any one.

I go out to fish for cat-fish in open season for cat-fish and I inadvertently catch a bass, it being closed season for bass, what have I done? I remember a case like that. I set night lines for cat-fish nearly thirty years ago. When I came there in the morning, one hook had one of the biggest bass ever taken out of Greenbrier River. Not guilty.

State it reversely. A hypothetical case, not being able to state an actual case. A person goes fishing for bass in closed season, and catches a cat-fish, it being open season for cat fish? Not guilty. Both cases are doubtful, and it is the proudest boast of our law that the accused does have the benefit of the doubt, and a good thing for a good many.

I think that question of the rights of the fleeing criminal would prevent me from being a police officer, if there were nothing else in the way. It is a vexed question. Always the officer if he is attacked by the accused has the sympathy. If he shoots to stop or kill a fleeing criminal, he usually has to face a trial.

Power to kill is one thing. Right to kill is another. But the important one is wi dom to kill, and I think most officers would rather that ninety and nine prisoners escaped than to have undergo the painful necessity of killing a man who is trying to escape Our laws have always been careful of human life and liberty, and the laws have exercised an unusual vigilance over its police officers and those in authority, all the time stating the law to be: That an officer, or private person having legal authority to arrest, attempts to do so, and the other flies and is killed, the homicide is justifiable.

It was early recognized however that in case of a thief in towns that unless the thief was immediately apprehended that he would hide in the great mass of people that go to make up a city, and that it was expedient to recognize the law of hue and cry, by which all good citizens on the alarm being given by word of mouth or by the horn of a constable, join in pursuit of the fleeing person. In these street affrays there have been many deaths, and the courts have universally held that the persons engaged in the hue and cry were justified, even though the hue and cry had been falsely raised and no crime had been committed. This no doubt being on the theory that if an investigation had to be made before the criminal could be halted and held, that escapes would be numerous and that criminals might go clear of charge of murder if they turned and killed their pursuers.

The oldest expression of the law is from the Goths: "It is allowable to kill a thief if he cannot otherwise be taken." It seems to me that is a clear statement of the law. Observe the word "otherwise," that leaves in every case a fact for a jury to pass upon.

In the Poague case, the question was, whether the deceased would have escaped but for the shooting. It brings up the question of the availability of a boat; whether any of the men or boys who joined in the hue and cry could have overtaken him by wading; and whether persons on the other bank of the river could have been notified in time to intercept him.

All these points were decided by the jury in favor of the defendant Poague, and the verdict of the jury is not subject to any criticism whatever, any more than it is subject to appeal.

The shooting occurred on the 4th day of September, 1922, and an indictment followed on the next day, and the first trial at the October court The net result is that a great many persons have become well informed on the subject of shooting at running things, and to say the least shooting will be conducted with less abandon than heretofore I feel pretty sure that Capt. Poague will let someone else capture the next man that takes to the river in time of flood, for the whole thing from beginning to the end has been an ordeal such as few men are ever called upon to undergo.

In studying the history of the tenderness of the law for the safety of the persons that it has taken in charge, I found some curious cases In one case the manager of the poor house was mulcted in damages to the amount of sixty pounds for cutting off the hair of a pauper without consent being given.

But the queerest case was one that happened long, long ago in England It was a case where a prisoner had been tried and sentenced to death by beheading, and the sheriff of the county was ordered to see to the execution. By some mischance or maybe through malice, the sheriff carried out the order, except that instead of beheading the man, he hung him. Reading between the lines we seem to remember that beheading was a more honorable death than hanging. Anyway the sheriff was convicted of murder, and presumably hung, for making the mistake in carrying out the order of the court.

It is safe to assume that for a long time after that a sheriff and his deputies exercised extraordinary care in separating the sheep from the goats, and seeing that those who belonged to the gallows did not get mixed in with those destined for the block.

Here is a law question: If a fleeing convict is killed, does the fact that he is a convict for whom a reward is offered inure to the benefit of the officer or person who kills the fugutive, the officer not knowing at the time that the fleeing person is an escaped convict?

In the case at bar this was not an all important question because of the fact that a felony had been committed the night before by burglars in the Stewart store, and this was fastened on the deceased in a conclusive manner.
